

Peter Schnall: Biography*

Peter Schnall is an independent advisor. Previously, he served as Capital One's chief risk officer with responsibility for credit, compliance, enterprise risk, and operational risk. Prior to his service as chief risk officer, Schnall was the company's chief credit officer from 2002 until 2006 and was a division head in the U.S. card business from 1997 to 2002, where he had business responsibility at various times for Capital One's super-prime, installment loan, and underserved businesses, in addition to several specialty segments. Before moving into the credit card division in 1997, Schnall served in the new business development area. Prior to working at Capital One, from 1994 to 1996, Schnall was a senior vice president at the Advisory Board Company. Before that, he was principal at Mercer Management consulting. At Mercer, he engaged in broad practice, focusing on business and operations strategy development across a broad range of industries, including telecommunications, consumer products, transportation, information services, and insurance.

Schnall has a B.A. in philosophy from Yale University.

*Nothing in the text should be construed as an endorsement of any organization or its products or services.